Diacritics is concerned primarily with the problems of criticism. The editors have adopted no formal policy governing the choice of books to be reviewed or critical perspectives to be explored; they invite suggestions and contributions from all quarters. This pluralistic stance does not imply advocacy of critical eclecticism; diacritical discussion entails distinguishing the methodological and ideological issues which critics encounter and setting forth a critical position in relation to them. Review articles, which are the principal component of each issue, should both provide a serious account of the work(s) under consideration and allow the reviewers to respond by developing their own ideas or positions.

Diacritics has adopted the documentation style now recommended by the Modern Language Association and asks authors to prepare manuscripts in accordance with the directives of the latest edition of the MLA Handbook for Writers of Research Papers. All texts submitted to Diacritics, including solicited articles, will be read by several members of the editorial board and evaluated collectively.
